Just got back from a pleasant night at Peter's. He let me start the fire but quickly gave in to his urge to precisely manage the fire.

He made a point of "introducing me to the setup". He'd spent hours chopping and stacking wood. Pine from a construction site. Hardwood from Craig's list. He had larger unsplit pieces on the left, smaller to the right, and pine in the front.

He'd borrowed a small/short sledge, a maul, and a wedge. Afterwards he reveled/marveled at his skill, and how much skill it takes to split wood. Very satisfying too.

We spent most of the night talking about his 3 "friends" love triangle. Turns out it was about his friend who was in love with a married woman and moving to Wisconsin to be with them in a month when they break the news.

Fri continued...

He apologized. I again encouraged him to consider that a friend who is involved in deceit might be better, more skillfully, ~~more~~ ethically dealt with using deception rather than an ultimatum, "let me know when you've told the woman to break it to her husband. They all run in similar circles. It would eventually get out from me to them and that would be good for all involved.

He spoke of his dissatisfaction with forgiveness as a concept because it elevates the ^{moral} status of the forgiver and degrades the forgiven's moral standing/dignity. But I assured him that many give and receive forgiveness with the full appreciation that we are all sinners, liars, thieves and not concerned with a small shift in the level of "righteousness". We don't all keep books,
